(Sixty-three percent were very satisfied.) • Satisfaction with CCOs: 78 percent of OHP members who were familiar with coordinated care organizations were satisfied with CCOs. (Fifty-five percent were very satisfied.) However, 35 percent of OHP members were unfamiliar with CCOs. • Ways to improve care: When asked what they would change, one-third of OHP members would not change OHP. However, for those who offered responses, the top changes were: expand coverage (23 percent), reduce wait times for care and customer service (12 percent) and improve access to and choice of providers (10 percent). OHP members showed support for the major proposals to change CCO contracts:

	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Improve access to behavioral health services: 76 percent of OHP members supported proposals that would do "more to get doctors and other providers to work together to help members who need mental health care and addiction services," even if these proposals could "be expensive and the changes may take a long time to improve care." Only 16 percent opposed. • Address social factors that affect health: 83 percent of OHP members supported proposals to "help members with other parts of their life, like housing, food, and other services, because having a home, food, and transportation helps people be healthy." Twelve percent opposed. • Contain costs: 50 percent of OHP members supported the proposal to "Find ways to save money on health care. This could ensure OHP members continue to have health coverage and benefits, but it may mean providers get paid less, and some OHP members have fewer providers to choose from." Thirty-four percent opposed. • Pay providers to improve member health: 48 percent supported proposals to "pay providers based on how well your doctors take care of you, instead of how many times you visit them," even if that may mean "there will be fewer providers for OHP members to choose from." Forty-two percent opposed this idea. • Transparency and representation: 63 percent of OHP members agreed "having more members help make decisions about OHP would improve your health care experience."
